Sonia is the only significant combination for Arpygyone (which was originally a bow guitar) that remains extinct today. The sonata was written in November 1824, about a month after returning to Vienna from his second stay in Zesleys. The history of the piece was probably commissioned by Schubert Vincennes Schuster's friend, who was a virtue of Arpygyone, an instrument that was invented only a year earlier. By the time sonata post-mortem was published in 1871, Arpygon's novelty enthusiasm had long since disappeared, along with the instrument itself. [1] Today, the piece is heard almost exclusively in transcription for violin and piano or viola and piano, arranged after post-mortem release, although versions that replace other instruments—including two basses, flute, yufonium and clarinet for arpygyone, or guitar or harp for the piano part—are also performed. Transcriptions have tried to address problems caused by the smaller playing range of these alternative instruments, as opposed to Arpygyone, as well as accompanying changes in expression (4 vs. 6 strings). It was recorded in the original by the following musicians: Klaus Stork and Alphonse Kontarsky (1974, LB No. 2533 174 on the archio production label). Klaus Stork played an Arpygyone attributed to Anton Mitis, the inventor's student, Johann Georg Stauffer; Alphonse Kontarsky played a Fortepiano Brodmann, built in Vienna in 1810. Alfred Lessing and Jozef De Beenhouwer (2000–2001, Ars Produktion FCD 368 392). On Henning's version of Ashaver from an early 19th-century instrument made either by J.J. Stavefer or by Anton Mitis, it is currently played in the Perus Cultural Heritage Foundation's musical instruments collection and on conrad graff's piano from Beethoven House in Bonn in 1824. Gerhart Darmstadt and Egino Klepper (2005, Cavalli Records CCD 242) Nicolas Deletaille and Paul Badura-Skoda (2006–2007, Fuga Libera FUG529). The recording was made in Florence (Accademia Bartolomeo Cristofori) on a Benjamin Laubrig Arpegion (2001), and fortepiano is a Conrad Graf (circa 1820) of Nikola Delitil and Allyn Rudier (2012, Ad Libitum) [full citation required] of labour movements made up of three movements.
